

The Major Loss Specialists
1-800-265-8381
www.mckellar.com

LAW TIMES

A NEUMAN ASSOCIATES INC.
Litigation Support, Forensic & Investigative Accounting Services

DAMAGE QUANTIFICATION SPECIALIST

Call 416-223-5991 ext. 134
Web: www.IFAccountant.com

$3.50 • Vol. 15, No. 28

September 20, 2004

www.lawtimesnews.com

AG's priority to deal with delays and gaps in court system Bryant vows action on family law issues

BY PATRICIA CHISHOLM
For Law Times

The Ontario government will be introducing a new system to track timelines, and to assess needs and gaps in the system to help deal with court delays, Attorney General Michael Bryant told a gathering of lawyers.

"I think everyone knows that there are some areas where everything seems to work quite well, and some areas where there are chronic problems," he said in a speech last week to the family law section of the Ontario Bar Association.

A pilot project will assess, among other things, the practicality of using faxes and video conferencing to help with filing court documents. He suggested that a pilot project may also be initiated to track what happens to so-called "crossover kids": children involved in custody battles who quickly end up in the criminal justice system.

Bryant was clearly trying to signal familiarity with, and concern about, family issues. He noted however, that the traditional nuclear family now makes up less than half of all families, with typical groupings now including single mothers, childless couples, and same-sex couples living with children.

But as all proficient speechmakers do, Bryant indulged in a few lighter comments before launching into the roundup of his government's family law priorities. He referred to the recent imbroglio in Ontario over attacks by pit bulls.

"I have found myself doing what I never imagined I'd be doing as attorney general,

Photo: Patricia Chisholm

'There will be no public defenders office in Ontario as long as I'm here,' Attorney General Michael Bryant told lawyers at the OBA last week.

which is not being so much your chief law officer as your chief dog catcher. My mom called me and said, 'Nine years at university . . . pit bulls.'" Keeping with the family theme, Bryant also noted that at home, where he is the father of a two-month-old and a two-year-old, he is the "chief diaper changer."

One of the major issues his government is tackling is a review of the Arbitration Act, in place since 1991. Currently underway with former attorney general Marion Boyd at the helm, the issues to be examined address concerns about vulnerable people participating in the system without their full consent (an issue that hit the news with the controversial creation of the Islamic Institute of Civil Justice, which allows some arbitrations to be conducted using tenets of Sharia law).

Despite the controversy, arbitration is a valuable alternative, Bryant added, noting that he is "really confident" about a report on the issue, currently being prepared by Boyd. The bar will be invited to comment when the report is produced, he said.

He also promised changes to pension laws to take account of stubborn problems in the area, such as when more than one claim is made against the same pension or how a pension should be dealt with when the marriage is late and short-lived.

No discussion of family law in Ontario can take place without touching on the subject of same-sex marriage — and divorce, he said, the day after the first same-sex divorce became a reality in Ontario. The province needs to change its laws to deal with such matters, he emphasized, drawing applause.

"I'll be introducing legislation to bring Ontario laws into compliance with the Halpern [v. Canada (Attorney General)] decision from the Court of Appeal," which gave gay and lesbian couples equal marriage rights.

See No public, page 2

Inside This Issue

Public Inquiry

4

Lawyers Rock!

5

Focus On Insurance Law

9

Quote of the week

"In some other common law jurisdictions there's no doubt that a deadlocked jury would result automatically in a stay of proceedings."

— Greg Goulin
See No fifth, page 3

Malpractice case intense for counsel

BY GAIL J. COHEN
Law Times

The case may be remembered by most as having the largest personal injury award in Canadian history at $10 million, but for the lawyers involved in the case it was simply the largest case in their history.

"It was one of the most intense personal and professional cases of my career, and I've done more than a few of these," says Domenic A. Crolla, who represented the defendant doctors Brian J. Penney and Greg Healey, in Crawford v. Penney.

It's a medical malpractice suit revolving around Melissa Crawford's 1983 catastrophic birth, during which she was deprived of oxygen for 15 minutes resulting in extensive and permanent brain injuries.

The case languished for about 10 years as Crawford's original counsel in Ottawa sat on the case and didn't do much. Robert Roth and his partner Richard Sommers, of Sommers & Roth in Toronto, got involved in the case when Crawford was 10 or 11 years old. They were approached by the family to take on the case and Roth says it was like starting from scratch.

There were no medical reports, no expert opinions, but there was a statement of claim and it was set for discovery, he says. While it was totally disorganized, he says, "it was a serious case so I was willing to take it on."

At issue in the case was whether Smith Falls, Ont., general practitioner Penney consulted an obstetrician and, along with Healey, a physician at the local hospital who practised obstetrics, took special precautions with Jeanette Crawford, who was overweight, 40 years old at the time of the birth, and because the baby was abnormally large.

After the head delivered, Crawford's shoulders became impacted in the birth canal and, for a critical period of time, her brain was starved of oxygen resulting in serious brain injuries.

It was still almost another decade after Roth took on the case before it went to trial. A number of issues had to be sorted out including whether to add another senior doctor from Ottawa to the case.

"It would have been a complete defence for Penney if he'd

See Big, page 2

Although Crawford was disorganized, it was a serious case Robert Roth was willing to take on.

Proudly Canadian.

1-800-410-1013

titleplus.lawyerdoneadeal.com

titleplus.ca

A made in Canada title insurance product developed with you and your client in mind. To learn how you can put TitlePLUS coverage to work,* visit titleplus.ca or call 1-800-410-1013 or 416-598-5899.

* Underwritten by Lawyers' Professional Indemnity Company (LPIC). Contact LPIC for brokers in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.
© Registered trademark of Lawyers' Professional Indemnity Company.

Big, lengthy trials have many challenges

Continued from page 1

been advised by a senior doctor," Roth points out, so it was imperative to establish what kind of contact the two doctors had. According to the Court of Appeal ruling, Penney did not in fact ever consult with the head of the Obstetrical Ultrasound Section at the Ottawa General Hospital as he'd claimed during discoveries.

It was a big trial with several hundred pages of written submissions and 300 exhibits, says Roth. With such big trials it's hard to schedule them. Currently in Toronto it takes about two years to get a trial date but in Ottawa it was only about a year.

"So with a big trial, you can't get a speedy trial," he says.

Once the hearing finally began, in May 2001, it was still a lengthy slog. The 60 trial days were spread from May to February the following year.

"A 60-day trial has a lot of personal challenges," says Crolla. "Apart from some time off in the summer, it was a full-time job, working around the clock."

Both sides agree it was not a run-of-the-mill case.

"You go through a lot with the client," says Roth. "Particularly since this is over such a long period of time."

"They are fine people and they have given up a tremendous amount to look after their daughter," he says.

It's taken a great toll on the family and he felt he really wanted to help them. "The grinding is the wait." Nonetheless, he says, you can't get too emotionally involved and must remain objective and professional.

In such cases, you have to be judicious about what you say in court, says Roth. Some things don't have to be said, he notes, adding he also won't bring children into court.

"It's not a circus, it's not a sideshow," he says. "We'd make a day-in-the-life video versus hauling them into court."

Beyond the emotional aspect of it, there were extensive medical and legal issues, says Roth. "Everything was in dispute. No one agreed on anything."

For Crolla, and co-counsel Daniel Boivin, one of the greatest challenges was finding experts who had been practising at the time but also were authoritative at the time. It was a "fairly select group."

Crolla says he read hundreds of articles about the science surrounding the case, which has been active and continuing over the years he's been working on the case.

"It starts with getting a good handle on the medical and scientific issues. It was tough here because the knowledge has developed a lot over 20 years," he says.

The topic is so ingrained after such a long time that Crolla still finds himself reading about obstetrics even as the case winds down.

Domenic Crolla says Crawford was a full-time, around-the-clock job.

Although the events happened years ago, Roth says he had no problems litigating something so old because it was based on findings of fact from reams of documents such as Penney's charts and notes.

"The strategy of the defence was to try and negate the information that [Penney] put in the chart himself. All the information was in the documents" but much of what Penney said was in conflict with his chart and notes, says Roth.

Crolla, who got involved in Crawford in 1994, has defended many doctors in malpractice suits but says there's never been one like this one.

"It was longer, more evidence, more experts, more complicated issues, science much more up in the air than in a great number of other medical malpractice suits," he says.

Dragging the case out even more, Justice Denis J. Power's 127-page decision wasn't released until Jan. 15, 2003, and it took almost nine months for the trial transcripts to be prepared before Crolla and Boivin could perfect their appeal.

The appeal was heard in June and the ruling released on Sept. 10.

The appeal panel of justices Jean-Marc Labrosse, Robert J. Sharpe, and Eleanore Cronk upheld the trial judge's decision that the delivery doctors were the cause of Crawford's injuries and his complex and detailed damages award of almost $10 million. Of that, the Ontario government will recover $1 million, Crawford's parents will be awarded $1 million, and the remainder will go to the young woman to pay for her continuing, around-the-clock care.

While the damages are high, Roth says they're not extraordinary as Crawford can't do anything for herself and also has a life expectancy of about 56, therefore requiring almost 40 years of high-level care.

"This case was based on worth and a mathematical calculation," he says.

Crolla says he's not sure whether his clients — both of whom are still practising medicine, although Penney has given up obstetrics — will seek leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada because they had not yet met to discuss the ruling.

"My clients are naturally disappointed in the outcome," he says. "We'll reflect on the decision very carefully and then make a decision. . . ."

No public defenders, promises Bryant

Continued from page 1

The definition of parent also needs revision, said Bryant, especially with respect to assisted reproduction.

"I'm not interested in having a bunch of antiquated laws sitting on the books on this," he said. "We need to get ahead of it."

He also made a pitch for lawyers to do more pro bono, carefully noting that it should not be a "tricky substitute for a healthy legal aid system." He said the AG's office is looking for a way to extend pro bono assistance, particularly in remote communities, by boosting legal education so that there is more public awareness of legal rights and alternatives.

"I'm hoping this will be by example," he said, for instance, by prompting firms, especially larger ones, to institute systems that ensure lawyers are not penalized for doing pro bono work. That said, he noted, legal aid should not be undermined.

"There will be no public defenders office in Ontario as long as I'm here," he said.

Bryant also spoke with conviction about domestic and sexual violence and noted that governments are "foolish and quite wrong" if they try to avoid the reality that the overwhelming majority of these victims are women. In addition to funding for frontline services like shelters and counselling for victims of such assaults, Bryant stressed the need for second-stage housing support for women and children.

It is key, he suggested, to "give those women who have been abused in their relationships a second chance at a normal life, a chance to get their lives back. We are deeply, deeply committed to making investments to make that happen and to do it in a way that is not a band-aid solution, but a comprehensive approach."

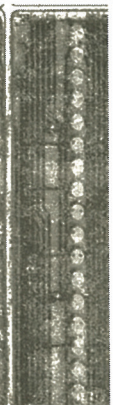

In closing, Bryant noted that the current majority government will be in office at least until October 2007. During that time, he said, "I would love to do a lot," adding that he wants to be as activist as possible, particularly in the area of family law.

Click & save 20%

Canada Law Book's

Monthly Web Specials

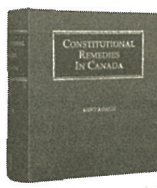

Charter of Rights Newsletter (includes binder)

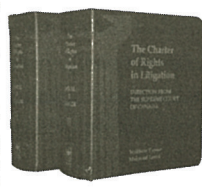

Charter of Rights Decisions

Constitutional Remedies in Canada

The Charter of Rights in Litigation: Direction from the Supreme Court of Canada

www.canadalawbook.ca

CLASSIFIED

SERVICES - Available law clerk. Proficient in estates, real estate, litigation, ADR, corporate/commercial and labour and employment. Part/full time. Messages (416) 621-2485.

DANSON, Recht, Voudouris LLP requires an ambitious associate with 2-5 years experience in personal injury law. Please fax resumes to Arnold Recht, 416-929-2192

For classified advertising call: (905) 841-6481
Sharon Black at (905) 713-4339 or
Susan Slessor at (905) 713-4393